Sometimes I can almost taste
what it would be like to see you again.
Perhaps on a Sunday, bustling on errands until shuffling into our old errors and taking a moment to sit at a local café table-round, built for two, with no room for laptops or whatever the latest contraption built to block conversation with a screen.

You would order your usual-iced tea, unsweetenedand I would order a skim soy mocha, with whip (if such combinations even exist) to show you that I’ve changed.
I’ve matured.
I drink coffee now,
I know the business-woman lingo but I haven’t forgotten to indulge in frothy fun from time to time.

I would hide my grimace while trying to drink coffee undisguised by cream and sugar and you would rub the tip of your nose, freckled as it always is by late summer.
We would listen to the barista bark orders and look out the window until you’d slowly bring your hands together in the universal symbol for awkward turtle.
We would laugh, then and I would push my coffee away remembering suddenly that you never were the one that judged.
So I would ask the clichéd questions but listen genuinely as you answered honestly, telling me how your dog is, how you finally stopped worrying about how nerdy your passion for robotics is, and how your little brother got his first girlfriend.

I would wonder if they reminded you of us at the age where we still classified “lip kisses” and my dad drove you home after dates and you accidentally scratched a pimple at my house once and I pretended not to notice the blood but you turned bright red, stuttering to excuse yourself to the bathroom.
But I wouldn’t ask those questions because we would be two mature individuals grabbing coffee and talking about the future while politely avoiding the past.

Until finally, I would open my mouth to release the “I’m sorry” it caged for four years only to realize, as you lean down to hug me our final goodbye that there is nothing to be sorry for.
