CLAREMONT McKENNA COLLEGE

IMMIGRANT EXPERIENCES IN THE UNITED STATES:
THE MURIDS OF SENEGAL IN NEW YORK

SUBMITTED TO
PROFESSOR EDWARD HALEY

AND

DEAN GREGORY HESS

BY

ANGELIA TYLER

FOR

SENIOR THESIS

FALL 2011
NOVEMBER 28, 2011
Acknowledgements

First, I would like to thank my Senegalese host family for welcoming me into their home during my time abroad. I would also like to thank Mbegane, Alexa and Abe, Idy and Basia, Mohamed, Assane, Sainabou, Moussa, Mamadou and many others for meeting with me and sharing their powerful stories of tragedy and triumph abroad. I would also like to thank Professor Pei at the Keck Center for International and Strategic Studies for sponsoring my research this summer which provided a great opportunity to continue my engagement with Senegalese communities. I would like to thank Professor Haley for his guidance and generosity as my thesis reader, advisor, and professor these past four years. I truly cannot thank him enough for his emphasis on effective communication skills which I will continue to apply in my future endeavors. Finally, I would like to thank my mom for her unwavering strength and the many other supportive people in my life for always believing in me.
Table of Contents

Introduction ..................................................................................................................1

Chapter 1: Historical Background ..............................................................................14
  Section A – Cultural Diaspora ..............................................................................18
  Section B – Trade Diaspora ..................................................................................22

Chapter 2: Sociological Theories of Assimilation .....................................................25

Chapter 3: Advantages of “Segmentation” .................................................................34

Chapter 4: Advantages of “Assimilation” .................................................................44

Chapter 5: Hope in Harlem: The Murids of Senegal Today .......................................54

Conclusion ..................................................................................................................61

Bibliography ...............................................................................................................65