Proof Theory

After Denise Levertov

A theorem's proof is not found as a sequence of easy propositions, or as an unearned gift, an immediate solution.

It is a struggle,
a hundred attempts that lead nowhere, failed lemma after failed lemma, abstractions, transformations, and morphisms that yield nothing, until at last a logical edifice emerges.

It is found by a seeker climbing the rocky stairs of a complex hypothesis, one mathematical step after another, until finally the wings of intuition brush past her,
and the theorem ascends.
